A recent survey asked American students to think about a person they most look up to, someone they admire – a role model.

One might have expected that they described their role models as being people they don't know personally, e.g. movie stars and athletes, or even fictional characters like Harry Potter. But actually young people tend to find role models that are in some way or another involved in their lives, such as their parents and close family, who give/gave them a set of values and a sense of direction and motivation. Quite often they also named teachers who inspire them. Usually those are people who are a little older because they are capable of explaining their insights well. Peers, however, may be role models just as well because they remind their mates that other young people also go through problems sometimes and still keep going or that they are honest and don't pretend to know all the right things to say or do.

Of course, the “heroes” in the entertainment and sports industries do serve as role models to millions of young Americans, which is why politicians every so often remind them of their responsibility e.g. to show that drug abuse is a crime and will be punished.
